THE VOICE OF A SOUTHERN REPUBLICAN.

The following letter from a Southern Republican to the N. Y. Times, referring to the sudden plunge in Ohio to one of that party toward the Republicans in the South since a President has been elected through the shameless and indomitable courage of the Republicans of Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina, is printed by that paper without attempt at reply, and will be found very pertinent at this time:

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, March 7, 1877.

Your article in the issue of 1876, entitled "What can be Done in the South" coming under my observation at the same time with the Atlanta Constitution of March 3 and the Macon Telegraph and Messenger, presents contrasts so striking that I am tempted to ask you a little space for comment. Read the Constitution editorial heading "Shackles and Slavery"—Constitutional Government Brought to an End"—and the "Rule of Fraud" Substituted"—Rutherford Declared President by the Grace of Madison Wells" and "The Usurpations of the House of Representatives"—"The Rose of Honor for the Greatest Scoundrel and the Smile of Scorn for the Greatest Statesman." Read the Macon Telegraph and Messenger. "Though deceived and betrayed by the partisan members of the Commission, we are still pledged to its orders and to Hayes's every movements of flags and rallying points and opposed to Radicalism on the bench, in the Church, in the halls of Legislature, in society, everywhere, let us peacefully await the solution of all our missions in the results of the next general election. Not to be Mr. Hayes to be envied. It will be either a President whose credentials and terms of office are base upon seeking fraud and corruption to rule about reform and conciliation."

One drop of comfort, however, serves to sweeten the bitter chalice which is pressed to our lips. It is that here after, more than ever before, the Democrats of the South will be forced to elevate together as one man, and stand for local government and their individual rights. The cannon's white Radical should be a song sound in our ears, and the solidity of our people should loom on the horizon of politics from their every crevices as the rock of Gibraltar to the waves that lash its base, so that Storey winds that now around us shall spare it."

These two papers—in Atlanta and Macon—are the real exponents of Southern opinion.

All the county papers are only echoes of these leading journals. If they refuse to copy servilely, they only succeed to modify their views—to veer their Hood. If you say "the Federal appointees ought to be men identified by social and personal interest, and, as far as possible, by birth and blood and other ties, with the best of the country in which they are to exercise their functions. They should be men of influence and probity, and known to be such. They should not be office-seekers, and should not, if it can be avoided, be dependent on their appointment for a livelihood." It does not need that this reorganization shall involve the abandonment of the Republican Party all its policy, or its organization." The whole people will feel noble and generous sentiment. But in view of the fierce "[illegible] swept over the desert air."

Government might find some such men in the Democratic ranks, but they would not accept office under a "Radical Administration." Knowing as they do, that their acceptance would involve them in bitter contempt and social ostracism. Doubtless men could be found to accept office, but they would be men whom no party could trust. This policy of throwing a sop to Cerberus" has been tried before enough by the Republican Party, and has only resulted in disconcerting it. It was tried in Tennessee. When Hon. G. W. Bowen was elected Senator, his son-in-law, Senator, became Governor ex-officio. He signed a call for a nominating convention, inviting all citizens, without regard to party—including those who, like himself, had been disenfranchised—to unite in electing all former citizens to one grand union of peace and harmony.

ABOUT ORGANS.

The most pronounced opponent of the new Administration appears to be THE BANGOR WHIG AND COURIER, the home organ of Senator Hamlin. Now that Mr. Blaine has been placed at the head of the Civil Service Committee, and shies the toning-down despatches of the Boston Journal, it will be reasonable to expect more moderate breezes from the East.—Boston Post.

It is natural for the Post to regard every political newspaper as the "organ" of somebody beside those who write its opinions, and it is not at all strange that the persons, who furnish matter to order for that paper, should be unable to understand that any journal can represent the views of its editor. The bandying of the epithet "organ" is so common and so feeble a weapon of controversy that on our own account we should never think of noticing it, but the Post should confine itself to pitching into us, and not do Senator Hamlin or any one else the injustice of holding them responsible for the views vouched for solely by the name at the head of this column. Senator Hamlin is abundantly able to take care of himself without the services of any "home organ," and we have always felt competent to express our own opinions without instructions from any quarter. As a matter of fact it rests hardly a man in public life against whom the charge of interfering with newspapers could be made with less propriety than against our Senator, for during a long and distinguished public career he has been noted for refraining from all effort to placate newspaper correspondents or to influence the press in any way. Indeed, we have hitherto remarked that in all our acquaintance with our eminent fellow-citizen he never sought in any way to influence or suggest our line of action upon any public matter. Our impression is that he entertains quite as hearty a contempt as we do for many newspapers and a great deal of what is nowadays styled journalism.

But our purpose was to indicate the injustice of the above paragraph by the fact that our Senator has arrived at conclusions different from those we have expressed in the articles evidently referred to by the Post. The published reports show that Mr. Hamlin freely assented to the confirmation of all the members of the new Cabinet, while we have strenuously objected to at least two of them. That he has acted with a conscientious regard for what he believed was under the circumstances for the best interests of the country and the party we have not the shadow of a doubt. More than this we have great confidence in his sagacity and judgment, and it is barely possible that standing at his point of view we might see our duty in the same light. But there is no sense in attributing to him or any one else in Washington the views which we have formed and expressed for ourselves in Bangor, and which we have not changed at any degree. With those views, as we hold them to-day, we would never give our fullest and consent to the appointment of Carl Schurz or D. M. Key as a Republican Cabinet. The position is our own, we stoutly maintain it, and we do not desire to transfer or evade a jot of the responsibility for assuming it and holding to it.

As to being an "opponent of the new Administration," that is the saying of the Boston Post, and our readers will not need to seek its columns to ascertain just where we stand. Our opinions of the Cabinet have been very carefully stated, and our unqualified protest against what has been promulgated through the press as phases of a proposed "new Southern policy," is emphatically on record. We are in favor of carrying out the principles of the National Republican Platform with reference to the protection of citizens and the maintenance of Constitutional guarantees in the South, and we oppose everybody and anything that seeks an abandonment or surrender of those principles. We have a right to expect the Administration to vindicate the pledges of the Platform; it is does so it will have that support which Republican principles have always commanded, if it repudiates those pledges it will have not only our opposition, but that of the calmest Republican masses of the Union. The Post can put that directly into its pipe and smoke it.

Now, reverting to organs, we are willing to concede that the Post is just now very much more consistent than the majority of its Republican contemporaries in Boston, for in favoring the propositions suggested by telegraph for the abandonment to the Republican State Governments in South Carolina and Louisiana to the Rifle Clubs and White Leaguers, it is simply indorsing the programme which its party has hitherto advocated, while they are unblushingly swallowing the doctrines they have stoutly maintained for years and which they have emphatically reiterated during the past three months. But still the Post should be modest in slurring about "organs," because the glass of its own habitation is so exceedingly thin and shaky. Only a few months ago the Boston Post was the "organ" and property of one E. D. Winslow, a swindler whose notoriety has pervaded two hemispheres; and just who have become his local descendants in its management is not so generally known. On the whole, neighbor, perhaps you had better not throw stones.

VERY, VERY FUNNY.

[Wash Cor, Boston Advertiser.]

Secretary Sherman took the oath on Saturday, but Messrs. Evarts, McCrary, Devens, Key and Schurz stood up in a line, with Chief Justice Carter of the District Court before them. He read the oath, until he came to: "You do solemnly swear that you have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States Government," when Mr. Key interrupted, exclaiming "Hold on, Judge, I can't swear to that." There was quite a laugh, and Justice Carter remarked in his quaint way: "That oath was good enough for us until you came, sir," when Key retired, and the remainder of the oath was read and assented to by the other four. Afterward it was found that there was not a copy of the modified oath in the White House, and Justice Carter had to administer it from memory.

One of the clearest thinkers, and one of the most intelligent political observers in Massachusetts writes us a gratifying commendation of our assertion of Republican principles, and in course of the letter quaintly remarks:

"If you weren't so tender and timid toward the Boston papers, I think you would observe that the Journal and Advertiser look up to the ceiling, like Sammy Weller, and don't see William Lloyd Garrison's letter at all." Whether any Boston paper, except the Traveller is acquainted with it, the only omniscient being, a handsome tortoise shell comb.

Mrs. Hayes' grace and gentleness were the theme of all tongues, and her praises will be sounded all over the land if she but keep each half the good will which she won on her first reception.

At Mrs. Hayes' right was Mrs. Governor Dennison in an elegant toilet velvet and thread lace. Her hair is slightly mixed with gray, and was without ornament save a comb.

Mrs. Tyner, wife of the ex-Postmaster General, joined the party in the course of the afternoon. Her dress was of black silk and velvet and very becoming. She wore a very elegant hat of creamy milkand velvet, with long plumes of the same shade.

Miss Platt's Princesse dress of crème damassee was very much admired, and the long sprays of flowers on her corsage most appropriate to the delicate fragrant and dainty figure of the fair guest of the family.

Miss Foote wore a blue silk with bands of embroidered roses and leaves in natural colors. Her hair was dressed in puffs without ornament.

Little Miss Hayes is a bright pretty child of nine years, and came in and played her little part to perfection. Her dress of white cambric was very simple, with wide sash of pale pink ribbon. Her hair is quite short, and brushed plainly back from her pleasant intelligent face. She is evidently daughter and the pet of the household.

Mrs. Rogers, the wife of the President's Private Secretary, a tall, stately lady, with a very pleasant face, was elegantly and very richly dressed, with facings and ruffles of navy blue. Her hair was worn without ornament or crimp or frizz.

The entire absence of anything like ornament in the Presidential party was remarked by every one present. Everything was absolutely simple and elegant in its way. The gloves were faultless; the laces exquisite; the fabrics the choicest product ons of their kind; but there was in all studied simplicity and an absence of fashionable ornaments. "Are we to have in the fashion a leader of good sense?" was asked by more than one lady who called at the Executive mansion to-day.

Among others present not already mentioned were Mrs. Sherman, wife of the new Secretary of the Treasury, a lady whom Washington admires and respects for her many estimable qualities. Her dress was black silk, plain but elegant.

The Secretary of State, W. Evarts and wife were also present, the latter in blues velvet with bands of gray fox.

Mrs. Chandler wore black velvet.

Mrs. Eugene Hale, black velvet and silk.

Mrs. Ray, the same materials. Indeed it might be called a black silk reception as nearly all the ladies were of this favorite material.

Mrs. Banks was dressed in black velvet, and Lieutenant Lee's daughter in blue silk.

Secretary Bliss was present, and in the best of spirits. He entertained a merry party with his witty conversation.

The reception was to end at five o'clock, but long after that hour the parlor continued filled with callers, who drifted into quiet corners and chatted about the new mistress and its probabilities."

NON-SECTARIANISM.

Letter From Senator Blaine.

SENATOR BLAINE ON THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE NEW HAMPSHIRE CONSTITUTION.

[From the Concord Monitor.]

We regret that the following statement of the letter of Senator Blaine, of Maine, did not come to hand sooner, so that we might have presented it before election day to the 20,000 readers of our weekly edition, for we feel certain that if every voter in our State could have perused it before depositing his vote, the adoption of the most important of the proposed amendments to our organic law would have been assured beyond a peradventure. Mr. Blaine's treatment of the religious test clause is such as might have been predicted of so enlightened, liberal and progressive a statesman and thinker, and his comments on the educational question show how thoroughly alive he is to the dangers which menace us in that direction.

WASHINGTON, D. C. Dec. 15, 1876.

Hon. W. E. Chandler, Concord N. H.

My Dear Sir:—I was glad to find in my brief interview with you, as you passed through Washington on your way South, that you are warmly in favor of removing from your Constitution those clauses which prohibit Roman Catholics from holding office in New Hampshire. I doubt not you will find a majority of your fellow members of the Constitutional Convention following the same views, and I certainly hope that all republicans will unite in striking from your organic law a prospective test which the Democrats established during their long supremacy in your State. It will especially gratify and specially signalize your success this day in having removed the disability imposed by a Democratic Constitutional Convention at the same time that others were imposed in well nigh absolute unanimity, and inflamed with unreasonable hate and bitterest rancor, against our party. It is easy and natural for any political party to extend the franchise and liberties of its allies and supporters—but it is the peculiar merit and honor of the Republican party, that it has extended franchise and liberty to friend and foe alike. It has removed political disabilities from a large class of influential men in all the Southern States, with the absolute certainty that the power thus freely given would be used for the defeat, and possibly, the destruction of the political organization that conferred it.

Let us be just and fair towards all. If the Republican party cannot help power in this country by the free suffrages of all the legal voters, without regard to creed, caste, color or nationality, then of course we go out of power and go out with unsullied honor and with a record of magnanimity and patriotism that has no parallel in the history of political organizations in America.

While removing all disabilities from Catholic voters in your State, do not fail at the same time to strengthen your system of free common schools with all the sanctions and safeguards of organic law. Deeply interested as thousands of Catholic laymen are in maintaining free schools as the only practical method of providing education for their children, the Catholic priesthood of the United States of America seem determined to break down the system of non-sectarian public instruction so happily established and so prosperous in many of the States. On that issue there must be no parleying and no faltering. Popular education, without regard to religious creed must be maintained in this country at all hazards as the only sure foundation of popular government, the only guaranty of liberty regulated by law. Alid the Catholic priesthood of the United States may as well understand that on this question there will be no compromise and not one hair's breadth of yielding by the advocates of the free common schools.

I have no desire to interpose my advice gratuitously in the affairs of your State, but the issue to which I have thus briefly referred will affect public opinion far beyond the boundaries of New Hampshire. An injurious public policy maintained by the Republicans in one State hinders the success of the party throughout the Union.

You are at liberty to communicate these views to any one who may care for my opinion on the question involved. And if you deem it desirable may make this letter public.

Very sincerely yours,

J. G. BLAINE.

UNSOUND JOURNALISM.

[From the Concord Monitor, March 9.]

The demoralization which has come upon the metropolitan press through the rise of so-called independent journalism, was never more conspicuously illustrated than during the past week. Misapprehending the "true inwardness" of the inaugural address, misled also by the Cabinet appointments, and the obsequious conduct of one or two quasi-Republican leaders, even the leading Republican newspapers of New York and Boston were induced to execute a rearward movement and to advocate a policy which, had it been adopted by the new administration, would have been fatal to it and fatal to the Republican party, because a course marked by greater baseness or more perfidious cowardice was never before outlined by a pack of graceless and conscienceless conspirators. The Washington correspondence, and to a considerable degree, the editorial departments of the N. Y. Times, Tribune, and Post indicated a depth of demoralization which can be accounted for on no hypothesis which credits them with honesty and sincerity in their support of the Republican party and policy during the campaign. For if any one fact was more prominent than another it was that the Republican battle was joined in behalf of justice and equal rights for the freedmen of the South. To desert the true men of that section under any circumstances were baseness unparalleled, to desert those men when to their fealty in the teeth of the most bitter prosecution ever devised, we owe the election of our President, implies a degree of perfidy beyond the power of words to fittingly characterize.

The country owes a debt of gratitude to James G. Blaine which it cannot repay.—But for his voice sounding above the sycophantic shouts of a feeble faction and the baleful adulation and the cowardly counsels of the metropolitan journals, the administration might have been powerless in the midst of the shameless party. As it is, while the olive branch is again extended to the misled parents, it is accompanied by the solemn assurance that all forms of opposition to the amended constitution must cease, and that the mandates of the federal government must be observed in spirit and letter at the South as well as the North.

Meantime our people have been taught a lesson, viz that with all its lability the Republican press of New York, and a large portion of that of Boston, is utterly untrustworthy when the party comes, or when expediency is put in the scales against principle. It is truly unfortunate that we have not in New York an able, first-class, newspaper, owned and controlled by native born Americans, who are too firmly grounded in the fundamental principles of the party to be enticed flying from their base in the disgraceful manner we have just seen exemplified in all three of the cases above mentioned.

THE OHIO SENATORSHIP.

[Washington Cor. Boston Advertiser]

General Garfield was seen by President Hayes last evening, and the two distinguished Ohioans had an extended conference in reference to the Ohio Senatorship. The President expressed a desire that the General should remain in the House of Representatives, thinking that he could be more useful to the country and the administration there than in the Senate. He admitted that he was asking a great sacrifice on General Garfield's part, for the reports from Columbus showed a probability of his election to Sherman's place, but after much urging, Mr. Garfield consented, and sent the following despatch to Columbus this evening:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 11, 1877.

Hon. T. H. McLean, Columbus, O.—

The President requests me to remain in the House, where he thinks I can at present be more useful in the work of the pacification of the country which his administration has undertaken. Therefore I will not be a candidate for the Senatorship. Give my thanks to those who have desired to support me. J. A. GARFIELD.

In order that it might be known that General Garfield made the sacrifice at President Hayes' request, the latter wrote him a formal letter, begging it as a personal favor that he remain in the House. Gen. Garfield's friends now think that Stanley Matthews should also make a sacrifice and withdraw from the Senatorial fight in order to contest Beaman's seat in the next Congress, to which he is justly entitled.

We confess that the above sounds a little queer in connection with much that has filled the newspapers of late. If President Hayes is to be above and beyond and beside of "party," what on earth do wants a Republican party leader in the House for we can't imagine. It is also rather in conflict with the new civil service "theory" for the President to interfere with the choice of a Senator, and that interference to promote the election of Stanley Matthews does not indicate that the President was very much offended by his assuming to suggest to Governor Chamberlain that it would please the Administration to have him surrender to Wade Hampton. It is all very queer.

Says the Boston Traveller: Sam Bowles spitefully announces for the thousandth time that Blaine is "extinguished." In the same number Slanderer, containing, there are at least eleven distinct articles and paragraphs referring to Senator Blaine and we observe that this is about the average importance daily attached to him by that and other "independent" papers. No other man appears to be so honored as the "extinguished" Senator, and if he thought it worth while he might be less distinguished by inviting some of the extinguishers to dinner—always bearing in mind from experience that if Bowles is included among the guests it wouldn't be safe to trust the company with any family secrets.

MRS. HAYES' FIRST RECEPTION.

[Wash. Cor. N. Y. Herald, March 10.]

"MRS. HAYES' FIRST RECEPTION A GREAT SUCCESS—SIMPLICITY, REFINEMENT AND ENTHUSIASM THE PREVAILING CHARACTERISTICS—SENATOR BLAINE CONTRIBUTES TO THE ENJOYMENT.

The streets of Washington, near the White House, looked this afternoon like Irving place when the ladies are going into or coming out of an operatic matinee at the Academy of Music. The occasion was Mrs. Hayes' first reception, and if the success of the debut be measured by the size and enthusiasm of the crowd, Mr. Hayes' first reception at the White House was a transcendent success.

Before the hour of three the crowd began to gather, and as the minutes passed the arrivals came thicker, and faster until there was a crush, a jam, a mob of distinction, fashion and beauty. Every one was anxious to get a view of the Chief Magistrate and his wife. The reception took place in the blue parlor, which was rendered a conservatory by the profusion of flowers and plants with which it was decorated. The President was in good spirits and received the shower of congratulations with quiet dignity and repose of manner.

Colonel Casey introduced the callers, and any number of ushers found employment in keeping the crowd within bounds and preserving order.

Mrs. Hayes wore a Princesse dress of black silk, with the loops and folds faced with pale blue silk. The dress was very plain but extremely elegant, the sleeves and throat finished with point lace. Her abundant hair, black and fine, and glossy, was brushed smoothly over the temples and gathered into a large coil at the back.

I have known Dr. Harrison for many years as a practical chemist. His statements are worthy of entire confidence. I have myself frequently used his valuable medicine made of his medical preparations, and have examined testimonials respecting their use from several medical authorities of this city, who employ them in their practice. I have frequently used the Peristaltic Lozenges, and think them to be a most agreeable and reliable medicine.

ST VALENTINE'S LOTTERY.

In Two Drawings

"We are not at liberty to say, Sir, it was made a particular request that we should not," etc. We are agents for our customers in these matters. Besides, wealthy people don't like trouble."

"Hem," said Frank, "I should like to have known, after my picture was done, nevertheless. You are really stocking rates, are you? I mean you are not going in for picture-stealing yourself, eh?"

"Oh dear, no, Sir! As I say, we do a great deal of agency business of this kind, you will find our name and address given in the catalogue frequently; that is for amateur ladies and gentlemen who don't want their own residences given. See," went on the man, producing a new but much trampled catalogue of the Exhibition, "there we are; here's a case this year, 'Brown, Corlsande, No. 842, care of Mr. Raphael Madder,' &c." His finger was travelling down the alphabetical list of contributors at the end of the book. Frank pounced on it eagerly (now he should find out at least the name of the artist who had painted him), and saying, "Allow me," sought out the water-color room. Quickly his eye took in a page or two of numbers, titles, and artists' names. Presently he flushed vividly, there it was undoubtedly, that was it, "No. 842. An Artist Sketching Grayston Towers; St. Valentine's Day." And so he had painted it after all? Why, "Corlsande Brown!" Then Frank turned to the alphabetical list again to make sure.

"What did you say was the name?" he was going on. "Yes, certainly, 'Corlsande Brown.' I see, care of Mr. Raphael Madder. O, then," addressing the man he liked the counter, "this picture is by another of your customers?"

The man's eye was following Frank's pointing figure. "Yes, that is so, Sir," was the answer.

"Do you know where it is for sale?"

"Cannot say, Sir, but I should fancy not, amateurs do not care to sell."

"And who is Corlsande Brown, may I ask?"

"I am not at liberty to say, Sir. It is quite anonymous, in point of fact, I don't know; Mr. Madder manages these things."

"Hem; very mysterious, indeed," said Frank, half angrily, "you won't tell me who bought my picture, and you won't tell me who painted a picture I admire, and, stop a bit, I want to buy it, you won't tell me whether it is for sale. Strange way of doing business."

"I'm sure my orders, Sir, but I'll find out. I'll ask Mr. Madder if he thinks the drawing you refer to is to be had."

"Well, I wish you would. I was going to something else, and I should like to have it if to be had. Well, then, I will call on Monday," continued Frank, after a pause, and give you an order to receive my picture, you say you will give me a check for the amount?"

"Yes, Sir, and let you know about the drawing at the same time. Good morning, Sir."

Very much puzzled indeed was Frank with all this. Strange Corlsande portrait of himself should be christened much as he had christened his portrait of her, "An Lady Sketching Grayston Towers, St. Valentine's Day." Odd, too, that Mr. Madder should be acting agent for the exhibition of the one and for the picture of the other. Well, it is a coincidence, of course, but all things remembered, it's a strange one." And Frank went on his way musing.

After a hasty run through the rooms on Monday of the opening day, he marched straight off again to Mr. Madder's, and found the rooms, spied out the picture over a number of artists' materials, awaiting him. Duly securing, or getting, and giving the order for the delivery of the picture to Mr. Madder, he said:

"Well, what about that drawing? Is it for sale?"

"Positively."

"Positively."

"Now, it is not by any chance the work of the same person who bought my picture, is it?"

"Really, I don't know, Sir; I cannot say."

"They are both customers of yours?"

"Yes, Sir."

"But they are not both the same person?"

"Upon my word, Sir," said the man, smiling, "I am not at liberty to say anything."

No, and strive as he would, Frank could get no more out of Mr Raphael Madder's man. But he drew his own conclusions, and he had to wait six weeks before he obtained any relief for the unusually perplexed state of his intellect.

The evening set apart by the President and Council of the Royal Academy for their grand soiree and reception came round, as it usually does, toward the end of June. Mr. Frank Hillary, like the rest of the exhibitors, was bidden to the entertainment, there to mingle with the motley throng ranging from the highest in the land to the most obscure followers of art—yes, like the rest of the exhibitors, for they are all invited. "She" might be there, then; at any rate, "Corlsande Brown" would be invited, and supposing she and the purchaser of his picture were one and the same person, why, he might see her perhaps! So he went to Burlington House in a state of due trepidation. Constantly he found himself prowling in the neighborhood first of his own portrait, and then of his own picture. Suddenly, on coming within range of the latter, he started, and had any of his goose friends been with him (which he thanked his stars was not the case) he certainly would again have become a butt for their good-humored chaff, for hooves thinking up to the roots of his hair.

A little knot of people were standing in front of No. 619, "A Lady Sketching," &c., evidently examining it with keen interest. One person only, however, of the group had any attraction for Frank. He saw nobody but her, for there she was, unmistakably, looking at her own portrait. Her profile was toward him, as it had been when he made the sketch, as it was now in its reproduction in the finished drawing. The likeness, under this severe test, was even more striking than ever, in spite of the vast difference in costume. In a bewilderment of admiration—not, be it understood, of his own skill, but of her beauty—Hilary hardly knew whether he was on his head or his heels. A hand on his shoulder aroused him, and turning, he was face to face with Mr. Hughes, his host at Hadenham.

"Glad to meet you, Mr. Hilary. I have been looking at your picture of Grayston Towers; it is capital! I recognized it from its fidelity to the sketch you showed me, which you made while staying with us; but the figure, the young lady, that was not in your original drawing; I think? that I suppose was a separate study which you did not show me?" and there was an airy significance in Mr. Hughes' last words.

Recovering from his momentary confusion, and stammering out something about its being an afterthought, Frank saw that Mr. Hughes made one of the party that had been looking at his picture.

"It is a capital likeness," continued that gentleman, "I know the lady intimately, and she is amazed and puzzled to imagine how you obtained her portrait; for she declares she never sat to you, and is highly indignant. She wishes me to present you to her, however, that she may ask you and call you to account. Allow me: Mr. Hillary, Miss Dacres;" and Frank immediately found himself bowing to his nymph of the woods.

"I am rather pleased with your picture, Mr. Hillary," she said, condescendingly, in a voice that notwithstanding the haughtiness of its tone, set his whole frame tingling. "If is very like—the place, I mean, we live close to Croyston, and I know it well."

"I am glad you approve," said Frank, now no longer blushing, his courage having risen to the occasion.

"But, pray," she went on, "how did you get a like—"

"Ah," he broke in, "I know what you are going to say. I must ask your forgiveness. A thousand pardons for having taken such a liberty; but it was irresistible—I mean, you were irresistible; as an artist, yourself, you can understand how well you come again those dark evergreens."

"Yes, you have made my dress tell very well, I grant," she said, glancing toward the picture within an ell of patronage; "but I want to know, and I insist on being told, how you were able to make a likeness of me, and how you know I am an artist? Is there anything in my personal appearance that suggests the sketcher?"

"Yes, gentlemen by when I see you on a camp-stool, with an color-box on you thumb!"

"Pray, where did you ever see me so?"

"Why, there—where I have painted you!" and Hilary pointed to the picture.

"Indeed! I was not aware that I was being watched. I did not know that espionage was one of the many accomplishments of a painter."

"I apologize. I dared not let you see me, or I should have lost my only great opportunity; but you had your revenge, I fancy," he added, looking straight into her dark-gray eyes, which she immediately dropped.

"I don't understand," she said, "I certainly did not see you when I was sketching 'Old Croyston'"—an emphasis on "Old Croyston's"—"on that very fine St. Valentine's day."

"Ah!" cried Frank; "no, you did not see me then; but how about the next day and the next? They were equally fine, did not you go again to the oak copse?"

"Really, I don't remember," shrugging her shoulders a little confused.

"Nay! There is a picture over there—if you won't mind coming to the other end of the room—that might possibly help your memory, it is rather a fearless coloring-down."

Frank offered his arm, and they moved away, followed by Mr. Hughes and his two elder daughters, who went with him.

Hilary stopped at course, immediately in front of his own portrait.

"That's it," he said. "Old Croyston-on-the-Wash, isn't it?" "An Artist Sketching," instead of a "Lady Sketching."

She made a pretense of looking at the picture, but then of searching for it in the catalogue. Then she said, archly:

"Corlsande Brown—who is she?"

"Ah, who indeed? Whoever she is, she is clever enough, and you see who she has been painting, don't you?"

"It is not unlike you, Mr. Hilary," she said, with an air of supreme innocence.

"No, not very unlike indeed. I was so vain that I wanted to buy it, because it was like—"

"And you could not?"

"No, Corlsande Brown was not to be purchased; she does not want to part with you."

"Am not sure that as a disciple of art she does not want to part with you."

"Ah, if I could only think that!" But I don't deserve such happiness, for, now you are, I have sold her portrait"—in the silence I dare-say—"and I have been miserable ever since, and what's more, I can't find out who has bought it."

"Perhaps Corlsande Brown has bought it," said Miss Dacres archly—the shot seemed to have told—"perhaps she wants it as a companion to her artist; the drawing-room is a little dull, and would look a happy pair—a pair of Valentines indeed."

Mr. Hughes here interrupted and changed the conversation by a reference to some other picture, to Frank's infinite disgust, and very little the liking of the crowd, and the talk of the rest of the party, he never again that night got a word with Miss Dacres. He lingered round her, but she had evidently two intentions that he should pass the subject, and that was Frank, but forgot all else and he, Mr. Hughes, as they adjourned with the company. He was in an agony of despair, but resolved, still, about the morning. He proposed beginning to go home—the Royal Academy scirees of 1870 was over, and the painter had to retire with the rest, in a state of dejection that was quite abject. Was there ever such a fascinating, charming woman? He began to build the most stupendous castles in the air. He must see her again; but how? He had failed even to get Mr. Hughes' town address, and he was under an engagement to leave London himself in a few days. Poor Frank! he was hard hit—he could not get over it. There was a gentleman, too, he thought, about all the stream Dacres quite remarkable; and they were, it must be admitted, sufficient to make a deep impression on the heart of susceptible and sensitive young artist, both young and old.

III.

THE PRIZE.

Once more the winter came round. The occupation of the intervening time does not concern us. Frank thought he dreamt of his pupils of the words they and nights; but his approach was growing enviable, when the hoped-for spring fortnight was revived early in the new year, by the receipt of a letter from Mr. Hughes, requesting that he would make an arrangements to go down to Hadenham to paint the portrait of another of his children. He went gladly, of course, and once more, by mid-February, had nearly completed his work. He had not dared to refer to Miss Dacres, his old hostility having again laid hold of him, he could not think of her without blushing. Mr Hughes was the first to mention her.

"We are going to drive over to Lockhurst, Mr. Hilary," he said) one day at luncheon, "where are a few good pictures there; you might be interested. By the way, you met Miss Dacres, I think. Of course, I remember; I introduced you at the Academy soiree. I don't know if she is at home, though, now."

"Miss Dacres lives at Lockhurst, then?" inquired Frank.

"Yes, sometimes. She is very well off and quite independent. She goes about a good deal, but spends the most of her time with an old aunt at Lockhurst. I hope she is there now."

And we may be sure Frank echoed that hope heartily.

It was realized. Miss Dacres was there, and renewed her acquaintance with Mr. Hilary, cordially, if a little shyly, but his courage never forsook him, he found when once in her presence. Her aunt was not at all, and she had to do the honors. The pictures, however, were not of much importance, being principally the work of amateurs; sketches which Miss Dacres had got together from her friends, with here and there a purchase from a water-color exhibition. They had been nearly all duly inspected, Frank making appropriate reference, of course, to Miss Dacres' own taste and skill in the art; and the party were passing along a corridor back to the drawing-room for afternoon tea, when the sight of an easel, through a half-open door, caught Hilary's attention.

"Your painting-room, Miss Dacres, I presume," he cried, stopping, while Mr. Hughes and the two daughters, who were in advance, continued their way to the drawing-room. "May I not be privileged to see what you are doing?"

"O I have very little to show; but if you care to look, walk in."

He did so, a step in advance of her. In an instant she shot by him like a rush of wind, and with a sweep of her arm rapidly drew a curtain across a little recess or alcove; but Frank's eyes were quicker than her action; she was too late, for he had seen—what? Why, his picture, "A Lady Sketching," etc., hanging on the wall, and side by side with it, as companion, his own portrait—"An Artist Sketching," etc.!

Covered with confusion and blushes, she stood convicted. "Far too generous to take undue advantage, Hilary immediately turned to the work on the easel, and after a few unmeaning words of criticism he said, "You are going to send this drawing to the Academy?"

"If I get it finished in time," she answered, reddening a little.

"O, you must; it would never do for Corlsande Brown not to be represented."

"If thing you are very unkind, Mr. Hilary," she said, pettishly.

"Do you then believe in a Christian spirit—return good for evil—be kind to me?" he said, in a low voice.

He hardly knew what he was saying, but he was very conscious of the trying of the colors, "faint heart," etc., and this consciousness swept all before it. He turned toward her.

"I have guessed this, hoped this, till
